THE KNIFE; LOOK TO CALDWELL!

HE fell upon the lobby, almost lifeless from exhaustion. Mr. Corbett stepped over her and rushed in the direction of the study, where the prisoner yet remained, but one of the servant maids, apprehensive lest blood might be shed, in the room, and in the presence of the ladies, met the former with the speed of lightning, and succeeded in entering the room before him, shut the door in his face, and bolted it from within. Mr. Corbett, conceiving that his lady was dying, so utterly devoted himself to the duty of attending to her, that he neglected to attend to the prisoner, who, however, by the assistance, and having raised her drooping head from the ground, was leaning over her on the lobby, when the prisoner, suddenly darting from his ambush, sprang down stairs. Mr. Corbett seized a book-jack and rushed it at the head of the prisoner, who, however, had succeeded in overtaking him, were it not that the same servant maid who had already interfered, threw herself in the course of the pursuer, and terminated the chase, and secured the presence of the physician. Mr. Corbett, a young lady of very prepossessing manners and great personal attraction, was examined at great length, and deposed in a very becoming manner to the facts detailed in the foregoing statement. The prisoner, a tall, athletic young man, who was aged thirty-six years, and who was dressed in very fashionable attire, when called upon for his defence, stated that the lady had made warm and repeated professions of attachment to him, and that he was only pursuing her on the encouragement he had thus received in acting as he had. The prisoner then produced four or five letters, signed for the most part, "Your affectionate Caroline," and all of which contained professions of the most passionate regard. Mrs. Corbett, on examining the contents of the letters, expressed her indignation at the most unmitigated indignation, all knowledge whatsoever of these documents, the production of which appeared to excite in no one more surprise than in herself. It was "false as hell," she asserted, and only procuring on the encouragement he had thus received in acting as he had. ANOTHER "DELICATE AFFAIR."

MR. P., a gentleman of fortune, and a member of the House of Commons, was proposed to settle £2,000 a year upon and to marry after his wife's death, should that occur within a certain period, upon conditions which she indignantly repelled; and in revenge he instituted the present accusation. The lady was discharged from custody.
